

Researcher

"You was born in the 1940s and worked at a scientific research institute",

"In July 1966, you returned to Beijing from Shanxi where you had been involved in the Four Cleans campaign. After returning to Beijing, you saw chaos everywhere, with Red Guards and 'Destroy the Four Olds' campaigns taking place. Your work unit's leaders were already losing influence, and the rebel faction controlled your work unit's activities. You worked in a scientific research unit, but research work completely stopped. Every day at work, you were required to read 'big-character posters' until lunch, and either write or continue reading them in the afternoon."

"Your elderly mother, in her seventies, was forced to return to her hometown in Hebei because of her landlord's family background and had to wear a black sash. On a bus, you witnessed a Red Guard stop someone from offering a seat to an elderly woman until they confirmed her family background. Women with curled hair or braids were often targeted by children in residential compounds who wanted to cut their hair. You avoided having your hair cut because you wore it in a bun. You saw young women with troubled personal lives forced to wear old shoes around their necks and be publicly humiliated. You regularly saw public struggle sessions in residential compounds, leaving you with no sense of safety."

"In your own courtyard, order was relatively stable compared to other areas. You frequently attended struggle meetings at Beihang University, China University of Geosciences, Tsinghua University, and Peking University. You saw Wang Guangmei and other high-level officials like Peng Dehuai and Peng Zhen publicly humiliated at struggle sessions."

"You felt the element of humiliation in these sessions was unacceptable, especially given these officials' past contributions. You could not understand why Chairman Mao did not protect these old comrades who had fought alongside him. You remembered key Red Guard leaders in Beijing, including Nie Yuanzi, Kuai Dafu, and Tan Houlan, who organized many revolutionary activities. You considered yourself a 'bystander' and avoided participating in struggle sessions after attending only two."

"From August 1966, during the 'great networking,' buses were too crowded to take, forcing you to buy a bicycle and cycle daily to work in Zhongguancun. You observed that children of workers were proud, while children of intellectuals and the 'five black categories' felt they could not lift their heads. You worried about explaining the chaotic situation to your children and felt you could not give them proper guidance. You witnessed children imitating Red Guards, beating people with belts, and torturing elderly residents."

"You observed that work unit leaders, including veterans of the Anti-Japanese War, refused to speak or participate in the violence, but also did not openly resist it.", "You were disturbed by the lack of rule of law and absence of any place to appeal for fairness."

"One night while returning home at 10 p.m., you were frightened by a jeep skidding to a stop next to you, driven by workers who were laughing and joking while replacing streetlights.",
"You felt depressed seeing these workers acting so proudly while the social order was collapsing."
